Excerpt: .playing upon his harp in view of a city in flames---a circumstance history has Christian, basking in the serenity of his own beliefs and hobbies, but deaf to the calls of charity and sympathy from a world perishing and dying at his feet. justly execrated--a less frightful picture than that of the Mr. Orr frequently called to see Miss Chippety, as well as Lena and Helen Ray; sometimes Paul was present on their visits, but oftener not; for he was forced to toil industriously to obtain the necessary means of living. He never faltered a moment in his labors, nor complained of their irksomeness; for he had now thoroughly mastered the lesson that duty was to be preferred to selfish aims and objects, even if these were the dearest aspirations of life.-From what he had already learned, he had faith God would attend to and nurture these, if we daily trod the path of duty set before us. Mr. Orr on several occasions visited many of the inmates of the tenement, leaving generous donations wherever he thought them needed. He found it difficult to make any definite discriminations among these people, all of whom were so truly wretched, their wretchedness was mainly different in degrees. Many of them could so illy restrain their appetites and passions that the least ray of prosperity--the smallest donation of charity--sent them in the exuberance of the moment to the saloon--that modern monster--which stands like a giant at..
