Not illustrated. 1903 Excerpt: . a rabbit s femur, after four were discharged, secured union in four months. Phelps (56) attempted a still more pretentious experiment by inserting a portion of a dog s bone with its nutrient artery still attached into a fracture, but on the tenth day the attempt was abandoned. When the non-union is in one of the bones of the forearm or leg, the other being sound, very good results may often be obtained by resection of a portion of the firm bones, thus allowing approximation of the ununited parts. CONCLUSIONS. 1. Non-union is of sufficiently frequent occurrence to merit careful study. 2. The large majority of cases may, by careful examination, be proven to be due to a mechanical local fault. 3. A small proportion is due to systemic causes. 4. A few cases are not to be explained even after the most painstaking study. 5. The treatment must almost entirely be directed to the local causes. 6. The insertion of foreign bodies into the tissues, in the shape of bone sutures and splints, is too frequently resorted to and is to be avoided, save in those cases where it is otherwise impossible to secure approximation or immobilization. 7. A very small proportion of cases of non-union will yield to no treatment whatsoever. BIBLIOGRAPHY. 1. International Clinics, 11th series. Vol. II. 2. Stimson, Fractures and Dislocations, Chap.
