Not illustrated. 1896 Excerpt: .them in a heap, put them in a box or, if old enough to understand, carry them to the kitchen to be used for building a fire. As early as possible I should teach the ohild to remove all traces of disorder as soon as he had finished playing with the paper. And I should be very particular to give the paper to the ohild myself, saying, Baby may tear this, and always have it understood that he must ask me what may be torn. I think it helps teach the child to be careful with books, for he soon learns to make a distinction. Some of the mothers looked relieved and some skeptical after the foregoing remarks. The next speaker was An Anxious, Nervous Mother: I have a boy of two years. Ha will take his father s books out of the bookcase in spite of punishments and offers of reward. What shall I do? The Mother Helper: The ohild loves, probably, the feeling of power, when his strong little arms pull down the books, more than he fears punishment or desires reward. Satisfy his feeling for power in some other way. Rring into your house--it may seem a greatdeal of work to you, but it saves work in the end--some rather heavy pieces of boards, ends of beams and anything of which you could collect a basketful where a new house is being built. Put these in a corner and let tnem do their...
